A. Senate adopts cheating policy clarifications

By Sharon Sherman
Staff Writer

With finals week quickly approaching, students should take note that the Academic Senate has brought cheating and plagiarism to the fore with Tuesday's passage of a revised resolution on the issue.

The current policy in the Campus Administrative Manual lacks adequate explanation and definition on cheating and fails to discuss plagiarism, the resolution states.

If approved by Cal Poly President Warren Baker, the adopted resolution will replace the present CAM guidelines on cheating.

"Cheating requires an 'F' course grade and further attendance in the course is prohibited," the resolution states. "However, if a student appeals the charge of cheating, s/he shall be permitted to remain in the class through the appeals process."

The resolution also states the dean of Student Affairs may determine if additional disciplinary action is required. Some of these actions are required special counseling, special paper or research assignments and suspension or dismissal from the university.

"The opinion of the Fairness Board and the Academic Senate, last spring, is that we do not want instructor discretion in the event of cheating — an automatic 'F' course grade would be required," said George Beardsley, chair of the Fairness Board. "Plagiarism is different in that the instructor has some options — unless there is a clear intent to deceive."

If there is no intent to deceive an instructor, it's not required to notify the dean of Student Affairs. Under those circumstances, "An instructor may choose to counsel the student and offer a remedy (within his/her authority) which is less severe than that required for cheating," the policy states.

A resolution on the sexual harassment policy was also adopted by the senate.

The purposes of the policy, as stated in the resolution, are to: "promote a positive working and learning environment on campus, provide Cal Poly faculty, staff and students with a specific procedure and policy to address sexual harassment, and provide due process for all parties involved."

Donna Duerk, chair of the Status of Women Committee which proposed the policy, said the intention is primarily to stop sexual harassment, rather than to

Year-end anxieties keep Poly police busy

By Marisa Fujikake
Staff Writer

Summer vacation begins in three weeks and students are anxious to get out. It is this time of the year that keeps Public Safety busy.

"Students are overzealous during this time of year," said Officer Alan Blair. This results in the increase of thefts, drunken driving violations, illegal parking violations and fire hazards, he said.

The major problem on campus at the end of every quarter is the increase in book thefts, said Blair. "People steal these books and sell them back (to the bookstore)."

Backpack thefts usually occur in the library and in the dining halls. This time of the year also invites the risk of thefts in the residence halls. Often during the last week of school, residence doors are left unlocked or open during the process of moving out. Stolen belongings in the past have included desktop items, cassette tapes and stereo walkmans.

Clothes may also be stolen from the residence hall laundry rooms, said Carol Folsom, coordinator of student development at Yosemite Hall. "If they're thinking of taking clothes, they're more apt to do it at the end of the year," Folsom said. "Nobody is going to see them wearing it when school is out."

Students should be aware of the consequences if caught stealing, said Blair. "We normally prosecute to the fullest extent of law," he said.

Increase in the number of parties poses yet another problem — drunken driving. More drunk driving violations occur throughout San Luis Obispo, said Blair. "Students are glad that they're getting out," he said.

Coupled with the increase in drunken driving violations is the increase in illegal parking viola-

Mouseketeer 'tails'

This Cellar manager experienced early life as a guitar-toting tot

By Marianne Biasotti
Staff Writer

M-I-C! K-E-Y! M-O-U-S-E... this tune is fondly remembered by honorary mouseketeers, now adults, who sat devoutly in front of the television sporting mouse ears, and even by those who never grew up with Bobby and Annette.

But the one who remembers it most at Cal Poly knew firsthand what it was like to dance and sing in front of the camera as an original member of the Mickey Mouse Club.

When she was only three years old, Vicki Blankinship, now Vicki Davenport, manager of The Cellar, was the youngest mouseketeer.

Davenport began dancing at age 3, and was encouraged to be a mouseketeer by her dance teacher, who was also choreographer for the Mickey Mouse Club.

Being on stage wasn't something she was pushed to do, but was something Davenport really enjoyed.

"I was never scared, it was in my blood and I loved it," Davenport said. "Some kids were nervous before going on

UU bowling alley set to reopen fall quarter

By Keith Nunes
Staff Writer

The bowling alley will be open fall quarter.

The University Union Executive Committee adopted a budget proposal Tuesday which will allow the opening of the bowling alley, despite speculation last week that there was not enough money in the budget to let it open for another year.

"Last week was a terrible mix-up," said Jocelyn Jones, a committee member. "The members of the UEC were given information, which was wrong. That information led us to believe there was not enough money in the budget to support the opening of the bowling alley. During the week the mistake was clarified and we found there was enough money to support opening the bowling alley."

"I'm not sure what took place last week," said Roger Conway, ASI executive director. "I was unable to attend last week's meeting, and when I returned it was the first time I had heard about the bowling alley not opening. I think it was a glitch in the system. The system of figuring out budget is very complex, and I believe the complexity of the issue caused some people to come to the wrong conclusion."

Christianity dropping in positive influence

Survey: Fewer laud societal impact

By James Welch
Staff Writer

Fewer students this year believe Christianity has a positive influence on society than did last year, according to a religious survey conducted by Campus Crusade for Christ.

Of the 157 students polled in this second annual survey, 62 percent said the impact of Christianity on the world is positive, whereas 15 percent said it isn't.

Campus Crusade for Christ conducted this survey to get an accurate picture of the religious attitudes, interests and opinions of students. The organization will use the results to help guide their efforts on campus.

"The survey helps us to see how we can help meet any needs or lack of understanding on campus," said Ron Gunn, a campus staff member of Campus Crusade for Christ.

The idea for the survey stems from similar types of surveys conducted at U.C.L.A. since the 1960s. Those surveys have become popular and are often used to determine the attitudes and beliefs of college students throughout the country every year.

Campus Crusade for Christ International first adapted these surveys to relate to religious views. Most of the surveys were conducted at major universities

Reagan on easy street with media

For all its might and democratic traditions America is skittish about national soul searching. The nation knows it has a host of problems, but also looks for perennial solace in the image of its leader.

Johnson was too crude, Nixon played the dual role of the Macbeths, Ford left with nary a trace and Carter was mired in malaise.

Then came Reagan. A simple man who simplified complexities. The nation ululated in jubilation. Here was a man who was not venal, exuded good nature, was at ease with himself, chopped wood on weekends and even appealed to the couch potatoes by watching rented movies in bed.

Reagan came at the right time. Carter had the moral rectitude to please conservative Democrats, but had it not been for Watergate he probably would have never paced the Oval Office. The famous Playboy interview in which he confessed to have lusted beyond Rosalyn certainly did not help.

The nation could even hear the scales dropping from his eyes when he was informed of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. His brooding in the waning days of his presidency over the American hostage situation in Tehran painfully emphasized his and the nation's powerlessness.

The national psyche could not accept the sight of the Stars and Stripes being defiled by a band of "heathens" inebriated in an orgy of pseudo-events staged for the benefit of the American mass media.

Reagan appealed to the American characteristics of cheerfulness, that tomorrow is always a better day. He brought a sense of pragmatism and practicality and, above all, a perception of success. All prized socio-political values for the nation.

municator bandwagon. The pundits, the Sam Donaldsons, Jack Nelsons, Hodding Carters shook their heads and pointed out inconsistencies through articles and news clips.

The public and a segment of the print press remained unwavering. No Cuban soldiers found in the mountains of Grenada? It was an honest mistake. Over 200 U.S. marines killed in the quagmire of Lebanon? It was a show of strength and an attempt to "uphold" the democratic principles of Lebanon. No trace found of the so-called Libyan hit squads reportedly ready to perpetuate terrorism on U.S. soil? Nobody answered that question since there were no real media follow-ups.

In his second term, Teflon sclerosis set in. The media, emboldered by the traces of rationality exhibited by the American public, reveled in the "sleaze factor," the shady Iran-contra dealings and the Zodiac alignment.

Although still emotionally attached to their head of state, Americans began to realize that he may have outstayed his welcome. His detachment, once viewed as a regal sign of delegation, was now resuscitated as intellectual idleness. His excessive reliance on subordinates was criticized as a fatal faux pas.

Although the foreign press has been trenchantly critical of the last days of the Reagan presidency, the U.S. media have refrained from the coup de grace. True, the Greek chorus is rebellious, but most have stayed on to go through the motions of repartee so that Reagan can sail to the Bel Air sunset at the end of the last reel with a semblance of dignity.

In the meantime, the British newsweekly "The Economist" had this May Zodiac outlook for Aquarian Reagan: "Reward a loyal follower. Remember a bush in hand is worth more than the bird. Old friends can hurt you. Your words (their words?) may come back to haunt you."

Last in a four-part series by various contributors examining the effects of Ronald Reagan's presidency. Nishan Havandjian is a Cal Poly journalism professor.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

We're unduly inculcated

Editor — The author of your 18 May diatribe ("Lack of Honor") needs further education on one of the basic tenets of journalistic integrity. Instead of a scathing indictment of a wrong, he has used the editorial page of the Mustang Daily to libel several thousand honest Cal Poly students. How can you justify such intemperate dogmatism, especially when your writer fails to offer any evidence beyond in-endo and misstated fact?

The claim that an honor system would be unworkable here "because too many Cal Poly students wouldn't be faithful to their pledge" disparages our integrity as students. If three people in a class cheat, that still leaves 27 honest students. Or should they be disgraced because "too many" students cheated?

Rhetorically, the author asked how many students would cheat without a proctor watching, given that three will with someone observing. I say three, but the editorial implied a larger number. The burden of proof lies with the accuser, and no proof was offered.

Admittedly, a sense of Rooseveltian pragmatism pervades the student body at Cal Poly. If something isn't specifically prohibited, then it's considered permissible behavior. Many instructors make it a point to inform their students that anyone caught cheating or plagiarizing will be failed in that course. Of those who do, how many have a significant amount of cheating take place? Even honest people can benefit from reminders to stay honest.

Truth is the ultimate defense against libel. If you cannot prove we are liars and cheats, then admit the slanderous nature of your editorial and apologize to the good students of Cal Poly.

Opponents file lawsuit saying taxes used to back Prop. 71

SACRAMENTO (AP) — Opponents of Proposition 71 are suing state schools chief Bill Honig and the Department of Education, contending taxpayer funds were illegally used to back the initiative.

Honig's department said the lawsuit is "totally without merit."

The lawsuit was filed Tuesday in Sacramento County Superior Court by Lewis Uhler, co-chairman of the main group opposing Proposition 71, and other groups.

A hearing is scheduled Friday on the lawsuit's request for a court order that Honig and the department use no more public funds to support the initiative.

Jonathan Coupal of the Pacific Legal Foundation, a conservative public interest law firm that is representing the groups suing, said the department published a booklet called "Agenda for the 21st Century: Blueprint for K-12 Education" that supported Proposition 71.

Report: Stanford not meeting needs of campus minorities

STANFORD (AP) — Students and union workers reacted angrily to a committee report that contends the private institution has failed to meet the needs of minority students, faculty and staff.

The University Committee on Minority Issues, a 21-member group appointed last fall by President Donald Kennedy and Provost James Rosse, reported Tuesday that Stanford reflects a "passive diversity," where people work and attend class together but remain separate.

United Stanford Workers, which represents 1,300 technical, maintenance and service employees at the university, said it was looking into possibly pursuing a class-action lawsuit claiming discrimination against workers on the basis of race, sex and age.

The United Graduate Students' Alliance said it has delivered a letter to Kennedy that urges special help for minority graduate students who face "critical issues threatening our survival and success."

Reagan heads for Moscow, says summit won't be easy

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Reagan, who once branded the Soviet Union an evil empire, embarked Thursday on his first trip to Moscow, saying superpower relations have "come a long way" since his 1985 face-off with Mikhail S. Gorbachev in Geneva.

At a White House departure ceremony held under dark skies and a steady rain, the president gave a mostly sunny assessment of relations between Moscow and Washington. But he acknowledged that "we have many differences — deep differences."

"There will be plenty of work for Mr. Gorbachev and me in Moscow next week," Reagan said. "I do not expect it to be easy."

The president and his wife Nancy then left for Helsinki, Finland, the first leg of their 10-day, 10,705-mile journey.

Reagan took off without the instruments of ratification for the Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces treaty.

Senate OKs plastic handgun ban, must settle with House

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Wednesday passed legislation to ban plastic handguns that could be slipped through the metal detectors at airports and federal buildings.

The anti-terrorism bill is similar to legislation passed by the House on a 413-4 vote earlier this month. Differences in the two will have to be resolved before the gun ban is sent to President Reagan for his signature.

The nation's major law enforcement groups lobbied heavily for the legislation, and worked out the compromise language with Attorney General Edwin Meese III. The National Rifle Association, after initial reluctance, went along with the approach.

The Senate bill, passed by voice vote without debate, includes an amendment by Senate Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas and Sen. Pete Wilson, R-Calif., that would require toy guns to have bright orange plugs in their barrels.

Japan relieved at Reagan's veto of retaliatory trade bill

TOKYO (AP) — The government expressed relief Wednesday after U.S. President Ronald Reagan vetoed an omnibus trade bill providing for sanctions against a Japanese electronics maker and retaliation against countries that violate international trade agreements.

The relief was qualified, however, by a vote overriding the veto in the U.S. House of Representatives and the reasons behind Reagan's disapproval of the bill.

Speaking to reporters at his official residence, Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita welcomed the veto and added, "Concern now is primarily on domestic issues in the United States. When the negotiations (between the White House and Congress) begin, the issues most affecting Japan will be brought out."

During a news conference, Hajime Tamura, minister of international trade and industry, said, "Our ministry has ... requested efforts from the United States government to see that the trade bill would not be enacted."

China denies arms activities with Pakistan and Argentina

BEIJING (AP) — China on Wednesday issued a series of denials about its activities on the world arms market, including reports that it helped Pakistan launch a missile and that it agreed to share technology for missile production with Argentina.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Li Zhaoxing denied reports that Chinese leaders agreed to supply Argentina with technology for producing anti-ship and medium-range missiles capable of hitting the Falkland Islands.

In 1982, Argentina lost a war to Britain over the islands, which it calls the Malvinas.

A report in The Sunday Times in London said China and Argentina signed a secret agreement during President Raul Alfonsin's visit to China last week. It said the agreement was for cooperation rather than sale of missiles and that China in return would receive access to Argentine research stations.

Li said no such agreement was discussed.

Multiple choice • Matching • Completion

Got those testin' blues again

T/F: Does the phrase above apply to you?

By Karen N. Smyth

By the time Cal Poly students graduate they will have spent a large amount of time learning how to take tests.

Teachers have their own philosophies about ways to administer their exams in a way that motivates students to learn. Students as well have ideas about the way tests should be given.

Although multiple choice exams are the most common forms of tests, controversies develop about whether scanners are really an effective means of testing a student's competence or merely trivial pursuit done with number two pencils. Students and teachers favor essay exams, yet the time constraints of a quarter system and large class sizes often inhibit that kind of freedom.

Calvin Wilvert, a professor in the social science department, says the best test is an essay. He said he believes that they are more conceptual than multiple choice tests. He said he does give essay exams to students in his upper-division classes. However, if he was to give essay exams to his larger, general education lower-division classes, he said he would spend "40 hours a week just grading tests." Wilvert said he does not believe in student graders.

"That's my job," he said.

Wilvert said despite the drawbacks of the multiple choice tests, advantages do exist. He said that everyone is tested objectively. Wilvert said that no matter which type of test is given, the outcome is generally the same: the well-prepared students will be more successful no matter how they are tested, and students who don't prepare will not do as well.

Wilvert also said that tests should be comprehensive, as opposed those that test only portions of the class material at a time. Wilvert, who has taught at the University of Vermont and U.C. Berkeley, said he was surprised to find himself the only instructor when he came to Cal Poly that used a comprehensive final.

Greg Martin, a new instructor to Cal Poly this year in the poultry science department, says that variety is the key to good testing.

"Certain students do better with certain kinds of tests," he said.

Martin also believes that tests are just another learning tool. He gives students their tests back as soon as possible, so they can learn from them. Martin said quizzes are better for students who study highly technical classes.

"It's better to go on short stints rather than whole hog," he said.

Jennifer Reed, a sophomore social science major transferring to business, said she thinks there should be more quizzes. She reasoned that quizzes are a motivation to keep up with reading assignments and that they help to prevent cramming for the midterm or final. Reed said she prefers essay exams, saying they are more straightforward than multiple choice and free of trick questions.

Karen Boster, a senior biochemistry major says her tests are mostly essay and short-answer. She said she was more comfortable with multiple choice exams since she knew that at least one of the answers given is right.

Boster and Reed agreed that they get most stressed over essay exams.

"You can B.S. a lot, but you still have to know something about what you are talking about," Boster said.

Test anxiety, often associated with final exams, is a condition that has stricken many a Poly student in one form or another. The anxiety affects students both physically and emotionally.

William Sydnor, a counselor at the Cal Poly Learning Assistance Center, often talks to students suffering from test anxiety. Sydnor says he's never seen a student actually become phobic over an exam. In extreme situations, however, test anxiety can trigger nausea or stomach upset in its victims.

Sydnor defined three precursors to test anxiety. The first is due to procrastination on studying as the day of the test nears. Another form of test anxiety develops from an insecurity about having only 50 minutes to organize material which students are used to retrieving from a textbook or notes with no time restrictions.

The third contributor to test anxiety is one of poor preparation, Sydnor said. Students in this situation may have put in study time, however they realize during the test that they still do not have a firm grasp of the most important concepts.

Sydnor said he often hears of students who will drink a beer before an exam, assuming that it will relieve some of the anxiety. He said that although the students claim that it works, it's not a good habit to get into.

According to Sydnor, the best way to combat test anxiety is through careful time management, a good diet and enough sleep. Rather than staying up late to cram in last bits of information, Sydnor said it's better to allow enough sleep. In this way the test-taker is not too tired to retrieve the information that is already understood.

Countering the argument of students who say they have so much studying to do that they can't exercise or sleep enough, Sydnor says, "they are too busy sawing to stop and sharpen it."

Sydnor says a student who uses caffeinated drinks to keep awake may actually be aggravating an anxiety.

Last-minute cramming that occurs minutes before an exam, Sydnor said, is also something to be avoided since it may further convince students that there is still something they don't know about the information, and it reduces students' confidence.

Beware: If you've moved, let the library know

By Brenda Suppanz
Staff Writer

If students don't keep their home addresses up to date in the library, they may find out about overdue book fees only after a hold has been placed on their records and fines have accumulated.

Sharon O'Brien, a library assistant in the circulation department, said that once a student's fines for overdue books reach $10 or more, the computer prints out a bill. "Every other week I print up the fines," she said. Students who receive overdue notices can then, after returning the book(s) to the library, either mail the payment to the cashier's office, or make the trip up the hill to pay the debt in person.

However, some students never receive overdue book notices because they have been mailed to the wrong address. The library records are not up to date with the school's, O'Brien said, because the computers are not linked together. "Because we have our own computer ... it's up to each student to update their address," she explained.

"Some people have over $100 worth of fines," O'Brien said.

Books are billed as lost when they are one month overdue, she added, saying that the price for lost books is set by the Chancellor's Office. Depending on the type of book, students are charged $20, $30 or $50.

The library takes steps to locate students with overdue books even if an address hasn't been updated, O'Brien said. If a bill is returned to the library because it had the wrong address, a flag is given to the computer to get a new address.

The library can also locate students by checking the computer printout of all Cal Poly students, O'Brien said. If a new address is located, the library sends a bill there.

"I do make attempts to find their current address," she said. However, when the student can't be located, sometimes the library mails it to the student's permanent address.

Another way the library lets students know about overdue books is by putting holds on academic records, O'Brien said.

Records held include report cards, financial aid checks and CAR forms. O'Brien explained a hold may affect students right away or during the next CAR schedule, depending on the hold period. "I just place my holds as they come out each day."

Even if students never receive notice of overdue book fees, O'Brien said, "they are responsible for the fines that have been accumulated on the book."

If a student feels a fine is unjust, the cashier's office said he must deal exclusively with the library. A Business Affairs representative said the office hasn't had any students complain about overdue book fees.

Students have to hunt and peck for library typewriters that work

By Diane Wright
Staff Writer

Students wanting to use typewriters in the library to complete final projects may run into problems.

There are 12 electric and seven manual typewriters available to students on a first-come first-served basis on the first, third and fifth floors of the library.

A recent check of the typewriters found one manual and six of the electric typewriters broken or in poor working order. Problems included broken backspace, tab and space bar keys.

Charles Beymer, assistant director of the library, said ideally a Cal Poly student who works in his office checks each typewriter by typing on it every day. However, one of his office workers recently quit without notice and his current office worker said she does not have the time to check each typewriter every day.

Repairs are done by a Office Machine Repair Service worker through the Cal Poly purchasing office. "I think with us he gives pretty good service," Beymer said. "He usually gets here the next day."

However, if a typewriter needs parts, Beymer's secretary said it usually takes 10 days to two weeks for parts to arrive.

Most of the typewriters are older models formerly used by Cal Poly staff and faculty.

"We've never been able to have the kind of budget to allow us to buy new typewriters," Beymer said. He said the library relies on the repairman from Office Machine Repair Service to offer typewriters that departments on campus no longer want.

Joanne King, a Cal Poly graduate student in the credential program, said she uses the typewriters regularly.

"The ones on the third floor are really bad," she said. King said the last one she used on the third floor would not advance and kept typing over the same spot.

King said she was impressed Cal Poly does not charge for use of the typewriters. She said she just transferred to Cal Poly from Humboldt State and students were charged 25 cents per half hour. "That's how they paid for maintenance — but they were all really good typewriters," King said.

Jennifer Alcock was using a typewriter on the third floor of the library last week. Alcock said, "It doesn't print the same color." Some of the letters printed half black and half red. She also said the backspace didn't work.

Last week the two other electric typewriters on the third floor were broken. One did not backspace and the other had a broken space bar.

Journalism major Doug Naschke said he used the typewriters several times this quarter. He said at one time only one of the five typewriters on the Faculty evaluations show teacher personality matters

But students say content of course is also important

By Marianne Biasotti
Staff Writer

Students spend a good part of classtime at the end of each quarter filling out faculty evaluations forms, never knowing what happens to those constructive criticisms, harsh slams or apathetic scrawls.

There is disagreement between students and faculty about how much importance these forms should play in assessing faculty ability, especially when this feedback could affect their careers.

Student evaluations, implemented at Cal Poly in 1972, originally were proposed to provide confidential feedback for instructors regarding the quality of their instruction.

The feedback provided by evaluations allows faculty to compare their performance from year to year and see whether they've improved, plateaued or are falling, said Charlie Crabb, crop science instructor and Academic Senate chair.

But faculty weren't aware that this feedback would eventually be used for review of retention, promotion and tenure. An instructor's personal file, which also includes evaluations from peers, is now turned in to the peer review committee, department head, school dean and the personnel department.

"Assessment is an area of national concern, a concern that we're not getting a number of qualified college graduates," said an administrator who wished to remain anonymous. "Generally, faculty needs and concerns are the priority here, and dictate the course of the university."

"It is a time when we are somewhat worried... there's a movement in the Legislature to have to assess us and the quality of job we're doing," said Lee Burgunder, a business professor.

However, unlike many instructors, Burgunder agrees that student evaluations should be used for retention and tenure reviews. "They want more documented information that we're doing what we say we're doing, and I think we are."

Other faculty question whether or not student feedback should be emphasized when evaluating their abilities.

"Sometimes faculty get callous about evaluations and say students can't really judge whether I'm doing a good job or not because they've never been out said.

"They're insulting the intelligence of students if they think we can't tell whether what they're teaching is valid or not," said Stan Van Vleck, ASI president.

"That's the exact reason we need faculty evaluations. If professors think that, they're in the industry.

— ASI President Stan Van Vleck

"Students have more experience with judging the quality of a professor's approach than most professors have — certainly they can make some objective decisions," said Crabb.

Joe Weatherby, political science instructor, thinks students can be better judges about the fairness of tests, the quality of the text, or whether or not they liked the class. "I think 80 percent of evaluations is personality — it's much more important than content with students," he said.

"I'm not certain they can judge content, or should," he wrong," he added.

"Maybe there's a sentiment — who are students to judge whether I'm a good teacher? There's some validity to that," Burgunder said.

"I don't think they're the best to judge but they have a point of view worth considering. It may be the best information we have at this moment," he said.

Students question whether or not they have input in the quality of instructor they pay to teach them.

"Theoretically, students' feedback should be a teacher's best source of information," said Kevin Roebuck, an industrial technology senior.

"I don't think they give students enough credit," Roebuck said. "Reality is in the classroom — the rest is all politics."

He said he gives the evaluations his best effort, although he doesn't know where they go or who gets them.

Martin Shapiro, a biology junior, said he can tell if faculty want to know if they're communicating or not.

"One teacher obviously had tenure and was waiting to retire. I didn't spend time to do the evaluation," he said.

He said he takes evaluations very seriously, and thinks they should be as important to faculty.

"We're not talking about whether or not they're great scholars, or if they know their field. We're talking about whether or not they're good performers in class," said Weatherby.

Crabb said there are other ways of motivating students, however, besides an instructor's personality.

"There are other ways of motivating students. If you don't want to get excited and jump around, fine, but then you need to create other means of doing it," said Crabb.

Students agree there is more to judging a teacher than personality.

"I had a teacher who was boring, but he didn't try to trick students," said Anna Castillo, an animal science senior. She said she learned a lot from that class because the instructor made sure students understood the material, and tested on what they knew, not what they didn't know.

"I look at teachers and decide if they're good, bad or indifferent, and that has to do with organization," said Scott

State grant allows 14 low-income children to use center

By Hope Hennessy
Staff Writer

A $10,080 grant from the state Department of Education will allow 14 lower-income elementary school children to participate in the Children's Center's Poly Trucker program this summer.

In the past, the 3-year-old program for 6 to 9-year-olds was open only to children of parents who could pay the weekly fee of $65. This is the first year that a grant has existed to accommodate children from lower-income families, said Evelyn Ruehr, food service manager at the center, on behalf of the center's director, Liz Regan.

"In April the Children's Center received a letter from the state Department of Education saying it had special money available for summer programs for children," said Ruehr. "This is one-time-only money. There is no guarantee that anything like this will be available next year," she said.

Ruehr said the grant has been a great asset to Cal Poly students and staff members who have more than one child.

"Our primary contacts for the program are students and staff who have a toddler in the traditional pre-school program and another child who has moved on to elementary school," said Ruehr. "If there are two children and they can both come here, it makes it easier on the parent. We like to keep families together," she said.

The eight-week program, which is based on a first-come, first-served basis for any family meeting the lower-income qualification, is almost full already.

"Before we even received the grant we had people calling and asking if we had room in our Poly Trucker program for children who fit the lower-income category. So we had some possibilities before we even had the grant.

"Fourteen is not very many. It doesn't take very long to fill up. If there was a way for this to be an ongoing opportunity for these children there would be a big demand, just from the indication we've received so far," she said.

Ruehr said the Poly Trucker program is comparable to the summer recreation programs in the community.

"We think we do more for the kids though," she said. "We have a lot of resources on campus to tap into. I think that possibly some of the community programs don't. They also work with a larger number of children than we do. We offer a lot of field trips and learning experiences that would be difficult if you had a large program.

"I think it's a great opportunity for the lower-income children because they have an exposure to the campus environment and some of them may never have that opportunity," she said. "If they start to become familiar with this, they can pick up on it later and feel comfortable at a college setting," Ruehr said.

The Children's Center is especially concerned that Cal Poly is not attracting a lot of minorities.

"Part of the reason is that we don't have a real good support system for minorities and they haven't had the exposure (to college campuses) early on. A number of these children fall into a minority area," she said.

"I think it's exciting and it's a way to benefit more children of working families and student families on this campus."

Two-legged offenders aren't only things that occupy Public Safety

By Marisa Fujikake
Staff Writer

It may seem like the campus Public Safety department deals with only thefts, assaults, bomb threats and other crimes. But almost every day, officers respond to unusual circumstances, often quite humorous ones, according to public safety officials.

This type of job requires dealing with people who usually have problems or stress, said Sgt. Robert Schumacher. "These lighter moments help to relieve our stress. It helps to be more humane when dealing with people."

Schumacher said he was once called out to the Swine Unit to solve a strange problem. "They had a giant hog that had its tooth caught through its nose ring," he said. "There's always a situation that comes along that tackles our imaginations as to how we are going to handle the situation."

Last week, Public Safety was called to handle a problem that involved a pig in a Yosemite Hall tower. Schumacher said students occasionally bring back animals from various units to the dorms. It may be out of the ordinary, but the people at the Swine Unit take these kinds of situations quite seriously, he said.

Parking Officer Cindy Campbell said pleasant relations with people brighten her day because, "You're usually dealing with people who are not happy to see you."

But one woman was grateful to see Campbell one day in the visitors' parking lot.

The woman's car locks were jammed, and she was locked inside the car, Campbell said. "She was beating on the car window to get my attention. She couldn't get the windows down and the locks were jammed, but I was able to pull the door handle from the outside to let her out."

Public Safety officials also said practical jokes within the campus police station help to relieve some of the stressful aspects of the job.

One time, investigators Ray Berrett and Wayne Carmack left for lunch, Schumacher said. While they were gone, other officials left a rooster and two hens in their office. "By the time they got back, the hens had laid three or four eggs, one of the eggs on Berrett's seat," he said.

Sometimes officers will receive a call, and when they arrive at the scene, they discover that something unexpected happened instead.

Several times they have been called to respond to the outdoor pool alarm. "We treat every alarm like a burglary," said Officer Mike Kennedy. A few times, they find students skinny dipping and not burglarizing, he said.

A memorable incident Kennedy dealt with involved a bull in the pasture near the campus entrance.

Kennedy was called out to Slack Street for a broken fence. He said two bulls had teamed up on another bull in the fenced-in pasture. That bull decided to break through the fence to get out, he said.

"The 2,000-pound bull was grazing in people's yards," he said.

"Schumacher, city police and I worked together on this situation," he said. They led the bull back into the pasture and shortly after, the two bulls charged at the straying bull, he said. The bull knocked out about 25 feet of fence as it tumbled down the embankment, he said.

"Finally, we walked the bull all the way back to the other side of campus, up through Grand Avenue and past the Administration Building," he said. "That was real funny. These kind of things can only happen at Cal Poly."

Resident surveys to decide future; General Plan 'essential' to city

By Keith Nunes
Staff Writer

The future size and shape of San Luis Obispo will be decided in the next year.

The city's General Plan, or "blueprint," is being revised and will decide how San Luis Obispo will grow and shape itself for the next five to 10 years.

"The General Plan is the vision of the community for its future. The plan covers such topics as circulation systems, land use, conservation of resources and housing," said Mike Multari, community development director for the city.

The city is currently in the fact-finding phase of the project. Mail and telephone surveys are being conducted in order to find out what residents think of San Luis Obispo. There will also be workshops conducted so residents may get more involved with the revision process.

"The General Plan is essential to our community," said City Councilmember Allen Settle. "If we can't control how we use our land, then we can't control our budget. I think the biggest problem facing the revision of the General Plan is the ability to be able to provide services for the city, for example water, sewer, police and fire."

"People don't understand how important the General Plan is to San Luis Obispo," said Multari. "The plan is more than just a rulebook, it is guidance for what the public wants for the city. All residents, students included, must get involved with the survey process. Cal Poly plays an enormous role in the city and has to be a participant in planning for the city's future."

According to Multari, the biggest problem facing San Luis Obispo is the conservation of its small-town image and protecting its rural areas.

"San Luis Obispo can no longer be considered an individual unit within the county. We affect other areas of the county, and they affect us as well. We must learn how to protect our individuality within the county, while maximizing our interaction with the rest of the county."

One situation which may have a major effect on the General Plan is the possibility of increased enrollment at Cal Poly. "We really have very little to say in the matter," said Multari. "If the state decides that they want Cal Poly to grow, all the city can do is file an environmental-impact report and show how such growth would affect the city. This is why the city and Cal Poly must work together so that both sides understand the situation."

Workshops for the General Plan will be held June 1, 22 and 28. For more information, contact the city's Community Development Department.

third floor worked. He said another time he found three of the typewriters taken apart. "There were pieces lying all over," Naschke said.

Electronic engineering major Herman Cho said he was happy with the way the typewriter he was using worked. "All the letters are dark and look OK," he said.

Beymer said some of the problems may be because the typewriters are located in isolated locations in the library where there is not a staff person nearby to go to for help. "Obviously a problem can pop up," he said.

There are notes on some of the typewriters giving instructions on how to set margins and tabs, but none of the rooms has a sign directing students with problems to the library office.

Beymer said students find his office and sometimes ask for new ribbons to put on the typewriters. He said he lets students change ribbons themselves if they want to. Beymer said he does not receive a lot of complaints. "The number of people who come to the office is very few," Beymer said.

Students can use word processing programs on microcomputers in the Curriculum Micro Center instead of the typewriters, but the demand is great; sign-up is for two-hour slots up to about two weeks in advance. Time slots are filled for all but one computer until May 26.

FACULTY

Hansen, a biology major.

Student evaluations are only one part of faculty files.

"Peer evaluations are much more important than student evaluations," said Harry Busselen, dean of the School of Professional Studies and Education.

"I think some students evaluate on how entertaining the instructor was during the quarter," Busselen said.

He said he accepts students' evaluations of faculty as they are the ultimate consumers of what faculty are producing.

"They (students) are the consumers, but how do they know what they're consuming?" Busselen asked.

"Peers can only judge part of a class when they're only sitting in for a couple of days," said Van Vleck. "Students go through the whole quarter and can compare information taught."

The effect of "good" or "bad" evaluations from students in and of themselves don't necessarily carry much weight in the fate of the instructor's job.

"Evaluations remain pretty consistent," said Weatherby. "Students are pretty generous — you have to be pretty bad (to get negative evaluations)."

If students' evaluations of a particular instructor are consistently bad, Weatherby said it could cause a lot of problems.

"If students come from a class and complain in mass, all hell breaks loose," Weatherby said. That has only happened three or four times, however, in the 20 years he has taught.

Busselen said in his four years as dean, he has never heard consistently from a group of students who didn't like an instructor. He said it is often hard to get to the real issue of complaints, and the number is usually very small.

"Would I dismiss faculty because of student evaluations? Absolutely not," Busselen said.

stage — I couldn't wait."

Davenport's specialty during her two years on the show was tap dancing and playing the guitar, but they wouldn't let her sing because of her voice.

The youngest mouseketeer was always accompanied to the studio by her mom. They would shoot many episodes in a day, a couple of days per week.

Because of the long hours spent in the studio, Davenport and the other mouseketeers received their early education by private teachers on the set. She didn't go to a public school until high school, where there were many movie stars' children who were "a bunch of brats."

Davenport remembers a trainer for the show who kept the children painfully in line.

"He had a cane, and if we didn't do it right he'd hit us. He was mean," Davenport said.

One of the most exciting things for Davenport was seeing Elvis Presley on the set and going to his wedding. Although he was more her mother's idol than hers, Davenport was struck by his stardom.

Because she was so young, Davenport can't remember as much as she'd like, but she remembers working with Annette Funicello.

"Annette ran the thing — she was the prime person in the Mouseketeers. She was stuck-up, and thought she was better than everyone else."

The money Davenport received from the show went toward furthering her career in modeling. After the Mickey Mouse Club, she became the model for Breck shampoo at the age of 5, appearing in magazines and on billboards. Next she appeared in the series Wagontrain, and when she was 7, she was the model for Morton salt.

"They wanted to make another Shirley Temple out of me," she said.

Her spot in the limelight ended when she had a kidney operation in the seventh grade. Although she and her mom thought she should continue, her father thought she was becoming too famous at such a young age.

"He thought I was becoming too big too fast," Davenport said.

The original Mouseketeers still have reunions, which Davenport compared to a high school reunion. "Some are writers, some are dead ... Annette still does peanut-butter commercials on T.V. and Bobby is tall, skinny and bald."

The most recent reunion was at Disneyland two years ago for the opening of an art gallery featuring Mickey Mouse Club memorabilia. Visitors can view old videos of the show in a room full of old mouseketeer photos.

Davenport said it's fun for her children to watch the show on the Disney Channel, as they say, "Look, there's mom!"

in Colorado, Arizona and New Mexico. The Cal Poly chapter duplicated that survey to use here.

"The original survey was for freshmen so we could see what types of attitudes they were bringing into Cal Poly," said Gunn. "We were doing it in the dorms at first but we found out there are a lot more than just freshmen living there."

This year's sample size was smaller than last year's because surveys are no longer allowed to be conducted in the dorms, making it harder for the group to concentrate on just surveying freshmen.

The students participating this year were predominantly Catholic with Presbyterians and Baptists accounting for the next two largest groups.

"You're seeing a dominant Catholic idea," said Gunn.

The second-biggest change from last year's survey (behind the question of Christianity's impact) was a drop from 83 percent to 74 percent who believed that Christianity had a positive influence on the history and development of this country. Other than these two questions, there were no major differences from last year's survey, said Gunn.

Fifty-two percent believed that Christians should be actively involved in bringing about social and moral changes in society. When asked in what way, social work was the top answer.

"Most people felt Christians should be involved through social work," said Gunn. "Very few would say that they should become involved politically."

"Less than 50 percent said they have read more that half of the Bible yet they seem to have very strong opinions. This I find very interesting."

Sixty percent believed, according to their personal understanding, that Jesus Christ was God, the Son of God, or the Savior. Forty-five percent said a person must believe in, and accept, Jesus in order to become a Christian, and 34 percent felt that nuclear war and the arms race will be the greatest problems this generation must face in the future.

punish.

The policy also states the university will determine remedies for people who are subject to "malicious, false allegations of sexual harassment."

"It's just as illegal for (someone) to press charges against someone that are unfounded as it is for someone to engage in sexual harassment," Duerk said.

The senate adopted a resolution to support use of book and periodical inflationary adjustments by the CSU in determining the annual library materials budget.

According to the resolution, a 1.99 percent increase in the acquisitions budget from 1985-86 to 1988-89 has not kept pace with the rapid inflation of books and periodicals during that time.

"The resulting loss of purchasing power has seriously reduced the number of new book and periodical titles that can be acquired by the library," the resolution states.

A copy of the resolution will be sent to the statewide academic senate and the Chancellor's Office.

SAFETY

tions. Cindy Campbell, parking officer, said that stress levels among students are at the highest during the beginning of fall quarter and toward the end of spring quarter. Consequently, they are more apt to park freely, she said.

Another problem that Public Safety as well as the Cal Poly Fire Department face is the increase in fire hazards within the residence halls and in the surrounding grass areas.

Last weekend, firecrackers were set off in Sequoia Hall, which resulted in two minor carpet burns, said Officer Joe Baranek. "The potential for fire is always there when handling firecrackers," Baranek said.

Firecrackers become more abundant during this time of year because of Fourth of July, said Chief John Paulsen of the Cal Poly Fire Department.

Some students buy them outside of the state and bring them in illegally, he said. The presence of firecrackers increases the risk of residence hall fires and vegetation fires. Injuries are also a concern for the fire department.

"We warn students at the beginning of every year that fireworks are forbidden," Paulsen said.

If a person is caught, depending on the severity of the violation, the person may be expelled. If caught dealing firecrackers, he may be arrested, he said.

Public Safety officials said that although there is no definite way to reduce the problems that occur toward the end of the year, they follow through with complete reports. This helps to increase the awareness of students of the seriousness involved in every case, said Sgt. Steve Schroeder.
